About the Music

Modest Mussorgsky’s Pictures at an Exhibition is one of the most significant piano compositions of the 19th century. It is a ten-movement suite portraying an imaginary viewing of an art collection. Mussorgsky composed the work in 1874, shortly after the death of his close friend, Russian architect and artist Viktor Hartmann.

Mussorgsky was one of several daring composers who created the dramatic Russian style characterized by its folk-like melodies, irregular rhythms, and modal power chords. Unlike conventional European art music, Mussorgsky’s piano pieces provided a fresh sound that caught the attention of numerous arrangers, including Maurice Ravel who orchestrated Pictures at an Exhibition in 1922.

This arrangement explores three sections from the original work. Opening with Promenade, the listener strolls through the art exhibit accompanied by strong thematic material. Next, Bydlo (The Oxcart) allows the listener to see a lumbering oxcart as it approaches, and then passes by. The arrangement concludes with The Great Gate of Kiev. While Viktor Hartmann entered the sketch of a magnificent gate in a national competition and won, the monument was never built.

To help students internalize the nationalistic Russian style, it is important to play recorded works. Recommended Russian composers include The Mighty Five: Mily Balakirev, Aleksandr Borodin, César Cui, Modest Mussorgsky, and Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov.
